Last year, police there arrested a mother for re-entering the U.S. illegally following a drunk-driving conviction. Now, with an immigrant, Democratic Rep. Raul Grijalva's help, the city is enforcing a law against polluting the air with greenhouse gases. "Cerritos has always been a leader in the community," Grijalva said. "The same will be true now." Cerritos sued the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power in July, claiming the utility was violating air pollution limits and violating residents' constitutional rights. Now, citing earlier convictions, the city won: the fine for violating federal air pollution laws is $5,000, and for violating its city air quality law, it's $25,000. Grijalva says the ruling should serve as a warning to other California cities that find themselves in similar situations. He's hoping to put laws on the books to require residents to report air pollution violations, to clarify who's in charge of enforcing regulations and to set standards for how fines are imposed. He says that, based on testimony, the law was intentionally violated to produce more air pollution because the city's utility provides water to factories. He called for more funding to clean up the air. "Cerritos' ability to fight for the protection of their community is now going to be really strong," he said. After the ruling, at a City Council meeting, police Chief Raul Seeley called it a "landmark decision" and lauded the activist efforts by the mayor, Councilman Sam Lopez and others. "The results of this action will make Cerritos better, cleaner and safer," Seeley said. So now what? The opinion by the Environmental Protection Agency cited the city's air quality law. The city appealed that decision to a federal administrative law judge. If the city loses, it could be fined again. "We expect that they'll continue to follow the law," said Terri Alaniz, an attorney with the law firm representing Cerritos
