While software is often synonymous with computer programs, the term "software" can also refer to other things, such as a set of instructions that can be used to set the clock rate in a device, as opposed to hard-coded settings. Software is frequently released as a set of files, such as computer programs, data sets, or other object files that must be compiled or assembled into executable objects to perform some function, a process referred to as "executable assembly." The software is typically stored on a disk or in a memory location. The software executable assembly is configured to solve problems for users or address the needs of system administrators. The design of some software is relatively small, writing only the code that is required to perform a function, and common. For example, a compiler includes a lexical analyzer, parser, and an interpreter, among other components. These components are inserted in various places to achieve the desired result. Some software is large and complex, and may include no less than one hundred components that are part of the complete design. In addition to varying in size from a few million to many millions of lines of code, the code may be written in multiple languages. For example, Visual Basic may be compiled to a C file; C may be compiled to an assembler code.

In the makefile, I have the following line: FC = $(FC) -c $(cflags) This is what I want to change: FC = $(FC) -c $(cflags) -include application.f90 I'm trying to add -include application.f90 so that the compiler will need to be compiled with -I, which is the path of my include directory. Is there any way I could make the following work? A: You cannot control the compiler include flag from within make. You have several options: Use -I to instruct the makefile generator to perform its own including. Call gfortran with -I to build with the include in the makefile. Pass -I as an argument to the gfortran command. Use -c gfortran option to make the compiler build in-place. The second and third methods will work even if you have not installed gfortran into your path.
