AS ALWAYS, Dont Get caught while using this tool:The present invention is directed to apparatus for the treatment of wastewater, particularly to the aeration and flocculation of wastewater. In its broadest sense, the field of the invention includes the science of wastewater treatment. More specifically, the invention is directed to apparatus for the aeration and flocculation of wastewater containing non-debris material. Wastewater from numerous sources, such as restaurants, laundries, animal feeding operations, food processing plants, and sewage treatment plants, includes waste which is comprised of non-debris material. Non-debris waste includes organic matter, such as grease, blood, vegetable matter, etc., and inorganic matter, such as hair, soap, detergents, and many other types of matter. The effect of these materials, whether alone or together, is to clog up the wastewater treatment process and/or to affect the appearance of the treated water. Therefore, it is desirable to remove these non-debris materials from the wastewater prior to the wastewater being treated. For many years, a flocculating process has been utilized to remove the non-debris material from wastewater. In the flocculating process, an agitation system such as an impeller agitator is used to cause the non-debris to flocculate and become clumped, resulting in a material which is called floc. The floc is then removed, for example, by settling, skimming, or filtering, and the wastewater is then ready for reuse. This process has been widely used, but unfortunately, the efficiency of this process has been less than desirable. In fact, much of the material which should flocculate, e.g., grease, soap, hair, etc., does not flocculate. Further, the floc collected from the wastewater is not always of a desirable size for the flocculating process, which results in a large percentage of this floc remaining in the wastewater. Also, the quantity of floc collected may be highly variable, depending upon many factors, such as, how well the impeller agitator is functioning, the speed at which the water is recirculated through the system, etc. Recently, aerators have been developed which improve the flocculation process. Typically, an aerator is a submerged unit which can be installed in a conduit of a wastewater system. The aerator includes an aerator member located in the conduit and 804945ef61
