the fact that neither the eu nor its establishment is interested in human rights and international law is also critical. consequently, for example, the united states is interested in prosecuting the suspects from the night of the airstrikes, but the eu has no interest whatsoever. the eu is not interested in the detention and processing of these immigrants. today, 24 june, it is expected that in addition to the focus on the hungary bill we will present a report with proposals for poland, although i would like to point out that even there we do not intend to return to normalcy. this all represents a real shock for the existing political system, which even today is silent and not reacting adequately. it is hard to say who and which problems will arise, but certainly we should not be surprised by any of them. today, june 24, there is a vote on the constitutional bill. to this end, we must clarify the objectives of hungary. the recent eurosceptic actions do not bring us closer to the countries of the eu. if we lose our sovereignty and ultimately our unity, then we will become a great state. a second element of our scheme would include possible restrictions on the principle of equal treatment in respect of both work and access to benefits. we suggest that the uk needs to utilise the restrictions on equal treatment that already exist in the citizens rights directive 2004/38 while developing the restrictions on the equal treatment principle contained in the brussels new settlement agreement negotiated by david cameron in february 2016. we suggest that this may (eventually) be acceptable to the eu because it reflects both the origins of the free movement provisions in the eu and a political realisation that free movement is less popular than it was for western eu states.
