The problem with the preexisting search feature is that it doesn't work as well as it should. It would be great if you could sort your results by most recent update, or most popular reviews. Google Plus may be holding many of their new apps hostage, but it appears as if they need user feedback more than ever. I actually spent just a little bit of time with Photoshop Express. When I was taking it for a test drive, I found it to be a minor improvement over the previous version and with a better UI. Unfortunately, it wasn't everything I would like. Thankfully, the recent update fixed some of the more annoying problems with the image resolution (e.g. no crop, no radial filters). It's really hard to tell how AppBrain works. It's not always clear when a new app is added and when they are updated. I'm not sure that I would pay for the Pro version if I didn't get the free trial. I think the problem with Photoshop Express right now is that it requires too much of a user's technical expertise. Of course, with all that being said there's the issue of future proofing. While a new version of Lightroom is expected in the near future, Adobe Lightroom Studio CC has been out for nearly an entire year. It doesn't mean that it's bad, but it warrants some consideration. Can you imagine a world where you can't do any more Lightroom projects at all? That's my concern. Sure, it's possible to have multiple projects going on in Lightroom, but it's not particularly easy, and anything but simple can quickly become very complex. The ability to move to a different platform from simple, easy to use, to something that would be getting extremely complicated while your old projects still live, is a very big problem. I'm quite aware that a lot of people would rather have us jump backwards to proprietary software, but I think that's missing the point.

It is very easy to use, but still very robust. The upside of Photoshop is that it has layers and a variety of preset filters suitable for most of your image editing needs. As a Devops & Sysadmin engineer and hacker, I basically build infrastructure online. I mainly use a Windows base, but also Linux, but rely heavily on a Mac.
