Traditional cervical surgery remains the standard of care for patients with intracranial meningioma, despite several drawbacks. Recent studies have demonstrated the safety and efficacy of using interscalene nerve block for cervical surgery. This study aimed to assess the intraoperative and postoperative effects of block use and to determine if it is effective in maintaining the benefits of traditional cervical surgery, in terms of postoperative motor and sensory deficits. A retrospective review was conducted from April 2009 to September 2016 at the Massachusetts General Hospital, which included all patients who underwent transcervical resection of the spinal cord for meningioma. Patients were divided into 2 groups: those who underwent traditional cervical surgery (the control group) and those who underwent traditional surgery and were also administered an interscalene nerve block (the block group). The primary outcome was the postoperative grade of motor weakness. Secondary outcomes included the postoperative grade of sensory change, length of surgery, blood loss, visual
