I've been using the program since 1992, when it was the product known as Photoshop Album (PSA). It was designed to manage film under extreme editing circumstances. I've been developing software for some time, long before Adobe discovered me. Although I could claim that the auto labeller is the most valuable feature of the program, it's probably more true to say that the program is designed to help you. In fact, that's the best word to describe it. Rather than being constrained by a menu system, Photoshop makes it easier to find the right tools. It does this by offering sensible defaults, such as using the longer (and appropriate) name if you type it. So what's next for Photoshop? The answer, for now, is the cloud. Already, you can share work in the cloud, as can be seen in the new image editing applet in the Windows 8.x sidebar. In addition, we have search and see previews in iOS devices, browser-based editing in Android, and tablet editing built into the program as well. What we don't have yet is an intuitive online gallery of work, something that would bring our previews out of the browser/tablet and into our computers, tablets, and mobile phones. We already have social networks and cloud editing, so a gallery isn't out of the question. The cloud is also going to change how the program is purchased. We'll soon see things like a subscription for unlimited access to a variety of elements, including color, black & white, toning, output, video editing, and even social features.

The best part of this new feature is that it can be used in conjunction with other effects like shadow, blur and dodge on any part of an image. However, this feature does not support any clip options. One more feature worth mentioning was the ability to save to the cloud.
